The existence of a cytoskeleton in smooth muscle has been documented since Purkinje nerve cells were first described. However, it has recently been realized that the intermediate filament (IF) network is not a smooth muscle specific element, but a fundamental protein network present in a number of non-muscle cell types. The presence of IF's in smooth muscle was discovered more than 30 years ago and they appear to provide the scaffold for the assembly of the contractile apparatus. We have demonstrated recently that the IF network in smooth muscle becomes reorganised in response to a mechanical load, either by stretch or by activation of the Na,K-ATPase. This report summarizes what we have learnt from our original experiments regarding the role of the IF network in smooth muscle contractility. We discuss how these new findings help to resolve some of the controversies concerning the existence of such a contractile apparatus and whether IFs provide a force transducing element of the contractile machinery, or, alternatively, are primarily present to provide a scaffold for some aspect of smooth muscle mechanics.List of Filipino women writers This is a list of women writers who were born in the Philippines or whose writings are closely
